ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

The publication of this bibliography would not have been possible without the advice, support, and encouragement of many people. Professors Michel Oksenberg and Robert Dernberger must be given credit for inspiring me to undertake this project. And, needless to say, I am deeply indebted to Weiying Wan, head of the University of Michigan Asia Library, for his full support throughout the preparation of this bibliography. I thank the University of Michigan Center for Chinese Studies for publishing this volume.

I owe special thanks to Barbara Congelosi and Diane Scherer for their special efforts on the painstaking editorial duties. I fully appreciate Ms. Congelosi's skill and patience, for it was through her efforts that this publication became presentable. Ms. Scherer must be credited for filling in all of the pinyin, compiling the index, and for typing the entire manuscript. I also extend my thanks to Professors Kenneth DeWoskin and James F. Dew for their helpful suggestions.

I would also like to express my appreciation to Professor P. K. Yu, Naomi Fukuda, Professor C. Y. Cheng, Mei-ying Lin, Sai-Cheung Yeung, Professor Anthony J. Kane, and my wife, J. H. Ma, for their constant encouragement and concern.

FOREWORD

Until the recent effort to revive the village and the township as the basic administrative units, the commune was the most important administrative and planning unit in post-1949 China. It was at the commune level that the people's congresses were elected, grain taxes collected, surplus grains purchased, and small industry and social services organized and supported. It was also at this level that projects for water control and irrigation were planned, and heavier machinery, such as tractors, harvesters, large pumps, and food processing equipment, was owned and its use coordinated. In addition, the commune had important responsibilities in such areas as elementary education, medical services, agricultural research, and the distribution of income and production.

Since their formation during the Great Leap Forward in 1958, the people's communes have undergone numerous changes in size and structure to accommodate rural patterns of communication, transport, and marketing. By mid-1975, the 75,000 communes estimated to have existed in 1963 had been consolidated into about 50,000. Communes have proved to be an important and lasting innovation of the Great Leap Forward and have played a major role in the transformation of China's rural, individual peasant economy into a collectivized agricultural system.

One of the major emphases of the University of Michigan Asia Library's collection efforts is the social, political, and economic development of post-1949 China. We have developed a strong collection of source materials capable of supporting a sophisticated level of research in these areas. In response to a growing and definite need to facilitate access to the contents of our collection and to facilitate the research work of faculty and students at Michigan and scholars elsewhere, we have at the same time initiated bibliographical efforts.

Mr. Wei-yi Ma, Chinese Bibliographer in the Asia Library, has culled information on various aspects of the commune from some 137 Chinese journals. His painstaking work will save the researcher hundreds of hours that would otherwise have been spent sifting through the literature for materials on China's communal economy, certainly one of the most important aspects of post-1949 China.

PREFACE

In the heat of August 1958, Chairman Mao Zedong went on a tour of the Chinese countryside.¹ He wanted to see how the Great Leap Forward he had sponsored was faring and what the fall harvest promised. His itinerary took him across the North China plain, including Henan Province, where he inspected a new type of rural organization.

With encouragement from Mao and others voiced during a Party meeting in Chengdu in March 1958, provincial and local officials in many parts of China had been experimenting with new forms of local government for several months. In some provinces, local officials merged the agricultural cooperatives into large, federated cooperatives embracing several thousand members. In other areas, they combined agricultural cooperatives, credit cooperatives, and supply and marketing cooperatives into a single, comprehensive economic cooperative. At the same time, the lowest rungs of the state apparatus were coping with a massive restructuring of the units below the county level: the districts (qu 区) and townships (xiang 乡). The nation's 20,000 qu were being abolished and the 240,000 xiang were being merged into some 80,000 units, each approximately the size of a local marketing area.²

All this occurred in the frenzy of the Great Leap Forward, when local organizations were responsible for maximum mobilization of labor and resources to accelerate China's growth. Both national and local leaders were searching for institutional forms that would facilitate control of the populace, or to use sociological jargon, that would enable maximum penetration of rural society by the state. Ideologically, given the tenor of the times, the ideal local institution would entail more extensive forms of collective life than the higher-stage agricultural producers' cooperatives of 1956-58. That would include

² On the elimination of qu and merger of xiang, see Jane Lieberthal, "From Cooperative to Commune: An Analysis of Rural Administrative Policy in China, 1955-1958" (M.A. thesis, Columbia University, 1970). peasant income based on a larger collective unit, reduction or elimination of private plots, and shared social responsibilities.

Visiting the collective at Qiliying in the Xinxiang area of Henan during his tour, the Chairman discovered what he had been seeking: the people's commune (renmin gongshe 人民公社). This organizational structure combined all the previously separate economic and governmental organizations (agricultural coops, credit coops, supply and marketing coops, the xiang and the qu) into one huge, integrated organization. The new organization merged collectively held property (i.e., in which the members of the collective shared in the ownership of property) with property owned by the state and restricted private property. In Marxist terms, it represented a new and "higher" form of social organization, offering the hope of an accelerated transition to genuine communism in China. Individual income of the commune members, which totaled up to 70,000 peasants in the earliest Henan experiments, was to be shared from the total income of the commune.

Not only did Mao like what he saw at Qiliying, he ended his visit there by saying, "People's communes are good." This quotation of Mao was widely repeated as a signal to cadres elsewhere, encouraging the adoption of the commune as the standard form of local organization throughout the nation. Literally within weeks, at least in form, his wish was met, ushering in one of the great experiments in social engineering in the history of mankind.³

The rapid adoption of communes throughout China in the summer and fall of 1958 coincided with a bountiful harvest, due largely to excellent weather conditions. In the following year, the initial hope and promise of the commune system were disappointed as production plummeted, due partly to poor weather but also to the unworkable features of the commune in its initial form. Malnutrition and starvation haunted the land. By 1962, considerable changes had occurred in the commune's original design. Overall size was reduced, and individual income became tied to the production of the subunits to which peasants belonged—the brigade or team—rather than to the commune as a whole.

From 1962 to 1978, commune organization remained basically stable, though a number of issues remained.⁴ At exactly what level was peasant income to be pooled and distributed: brigade or team? What should be the size of the commune, brigade, and team? How were peasant wages to be determined? How much autonomy were the brigade and team to enjoy in deciding cropping patterns, labor deployment, and resource allocation? What percentage of cultivated acreage was to be tilled as private plots? How many crops and products could be traded on the free market and how was the market to be regulated? What were the appropriate qualifications for officials within the commune system? These and some other issues were intensely debated in the Politburo and policy changed over time.⁵ Yet the basic system was not really challenged.

³ The idea of the commune is explored in H. Franz Shurmann, Ideology and Organization in Communist China (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1966).

⁴ Extensive discussions of the commune system are in Frederick W. Crook, "The Commune System in the People's Republic of China, 1963-1974," in China: A Reassessment of the Economy, papers submitted to the Joint Economic Committee of the Congress of the United States (Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1975), pp. 366-410; William Parrish and Martin Whyte, Village and Family in Contemporary China (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978); and Benedict Stavis, People's Communes and Rural Development in China (Ithaca, N.Y.: Center for International Studies, Cornell University, 1974).

As a result, for over twenty years, and particularly after the initial modifications of the early 1960s, rural institutions in China were basically stable, although, to be sure, there was sometimes a high turnover rate among officials as institutions were buffeted by the various campaigns: the "Four Cleans" (siqing 四清), the Cultural Revolution, or the "anti-bourgeois rights."⁶ During this era, with perhaps the exceptions of North Korea and Albania, China had the most tightly organized peasantry among the developing countries. The regime made as extensive and sustained an effort to transform peasant values as has ever been attempted. It sought to integrate economic and political-administrative functions in an unprecedented fashion. It sought to make each commune basically self-sufficient, with profound implications for the way the entire economy and polity operated. Communes were expected to absorb and cope with the problems of unemployment and poverty that are often partially shifted to urban areas in other developing countries.

At this writing, it appears that the commune system so identified with the rule of Mao Zedong is coming to an end. Since Deng Xiaoping and his associates consolidated their grip on the reins of power in China in late 1978, the Chinese countryside has experienced major institutional changes. Self-reliance has been abandoned as an objective so that local areas can make use of their comparative advantages. The method of organizing production within the rural commune is radically different, with farmer income in most regions now directly tied to the production of a particular plot of land for which the farmer is responsible.⁷ The authority of the brigade and team has been greatly circumscribed as private plots and the free market have been expanded. Even more fundamental, according to the draft government constitution, the unity of economic and political organization is to be abandoned. While credit, marketing, some industrial and agricultural production, machinery parts, and irrigation projects—the economic side of things—are to remain under integrated commune management, the collection of taxes, maintenance of public order, supervision of education, etc.—the political-administrative side—are to be transferred to a resurrected xiang political administrative unit. Thus, the delineation of collective and state organization is to be more sharply drawn. Even within the more narrow scope of the communes' responsibilities and authorities, however, significant changes are currently taking place. In many communes, presently estimated at approximately half of the total number, the resources and capital (including land) and production assignments are being farmed out to the individual households. The households organize production to meet their assignments and are allowed to keep any surplus they are able to produce. In these cases, the communes no longer engage in the management of production nor are they the source of the peasants' income. Rather, the household, once again, becomes the basic unit of production and income distribution in Chinese agriculture.

⁶ The impact of these campaigns on the countryside is traced in Richard Baum and Frederick C. Teiwes, Ssu-ch'ing: The Socialist Education Movement of 1962-1966, China Research Monographs, no. 2 (Berkeley: Center for Chinese Studies, 1968); Richard Baum, "The Cultural Revolution in the Countryside," in Thomas Robinson, The Cultural Revolution in China (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1971).

The nature of the now at least temporarily abandoned commune experiment—how it worked, its extraordinary costs as well as its gains—is only now beginning to be understood.⁸ Even though the commune system of the Maoist era apparently is not surviving into the post-Mao era, it is certain that for decades in the future, historians, economists, sociologists, anthropologists, and political scientists will study the commune experiment, in both its initial form and its subsequent revisions, in terms of both the stated ideal and the reality. This interest will extend beyond China specialists to rural development specialists and, more generally, to all who are interested in the limits and potentialities of politically induced social and economic change.

A comprehensive analysis of the commune system under Mao requires reliance on many sources: interviews with Chinese emigrés to Hong Kong;

⁷ Reforms along these lines were implemented in some areas of China in 1961–62, but Mao called these changes to a swift halt in August 1962, claiming they were antithetical to the commune system he wished to maintain.

accounts by researchers who visited communes for short or long periods; Chinese statistical reporting; novels and short stories; and, of course, Chinese press accounts. Each of these sources has its utility as well as deficiencies. Chinese newspaper accounts of particular communes have never been as fully used as they could be. In part, this is because of the inherent difficulties in using the source. The articles usually describe a model unit, not a typical unit. Few meaningful statistics are provided, and the available hard data are suspect. The accounts rarely shed much light on the historical evolution of the policy under consideration, and with a few exceptions, a particular locale receives the glare of publicity only two or three times over a twenty-year period. It is therefore impossible to truly capture the evolution of a particular place through reliance on the press. We now know enough about the reality of the commune years, in short, to realize that the contemporary press accounts bore little resemblance to the reality: for example, the human suffering of the post-Leap era, the politics involved in actually running a commune, the impact of the Cultural Revolution years on commune management.

Nonetheless, the press accounts offer insight into the official policy toward communes. What did the leaders wish to emphasize? What problems did they wish to publicize? What solutions did they offer? What regional differences existed among models? In what areas of China did the leaders find the greatest concentration of instances where their particular policy was successfully implemented? The Chinese press is an indispensable source for answering these questions.

Until Mr. Ma began, as a labor of love, to compile this catalogue several years ago, there was no really effective way to gain bibliographic control over Chinese newspaper and journal accounts of communes. Given the scattered nature of these sources, they were underutilized. This bibliography provides China scholars with the necessary access and, by means of the topical divisions, has facilitated research on commune policy in a wide range of areas. The bulk of the articles falls in the early stages of the commune, before the adjustments of the 1960s. As the whole experiment becomes a matter of the past, however, it is that first, pristine stage of 1958–61 which will particularly grip the imagination of scholars. What did Mao and his colleagues have in mind when they first advanced the idea of rural communes? How were they supposed to work? Where were the model communes located in each province? These important questions are best answered through a study of Chinese articles published at the time.

USER'S GUIDE

This bibliographic work on the people's communes contains references to more than 2,800 articles published in 137 Chinese journals between 1957 and the mid-1960s. A few, more contemporary references are cited when their inclusion seemed pertinent to the topic. Most of the articles listed here were published in Mainland China, although a number of others from Taiwan and Hong Kong are also included. The bibliography is based on the Chinese-language collection of the Asia Library at the University of Michigan.

There has been no systematic attempt to provide annotation for all of the articles listed in the bibliography. Annotations have generally been provided in cases where the title does not adequately speak to the content of the article, when the article is fairly long, or where the nature of the article warrants special attention. Locations of the various communes are noted whenever possible and/or relevant. The reader should note that the annotations are intended to be descriptive rather than critical.

Articles are arranged initially by subject area and then chronologically by year. They are then listed alphabetically by the first five romanized syllables of the Chinese title.

Individual entries begin with the five-syllable romanization of the title, followed by the Chinese characters and an English translation. Romanization and characters for individual authors are provided when available; however, "corporate" authors, such as communes, government agencies, and party organs, are omitted. This information is followed by the date, the volume, issue, and page numbers (when available), and the annotation (if any).

The romanization of personal and place names follows the pinyin system. Recognizing that this will pose some problems for readers accustomed to working with the Wade-Giles system, a standard conversion chart is included. In order to facilitate catalogue access to the journals, periodical titles have been provided in both pinyin and Wade-Giles.

A list of all periodicals, together with their abbreviations and original Chinese titles, precedes the entries. An alphabetical listing of commune names, accompanied by the numbers of the citations in which they are mentioned and their geographical location, comprises the index. The index may be used as a guide to articles relating to specific communes and geographic areas.

A very useful atlas that provides both maps and an alphabetical listing of place names is Zhonghua renmin gongheguo fen sheng ditu [Provincial atlas of the People's Republic of China], published by Ditu Chubanshe (Beijing) in 1977. Due to the fact that the names of some of the places mentioned in the articles have changed since the original publication, a suggested secondary reference is Renmin shouce, 1959-1965 [People's handbook, 1959-1965], by Da Gengbao.
