AFRICAN ARCHAEOLOGY

Series editors: Kevin MacDonald (UCL) and Paul Lane (Cambridge)

Past decades have witnessed a revolution in the archaeological narratives of early African agriculture, technology, urbanism and socio-political complexity. Indeed, the archaeology of Africa continues to expand significantly, with three major international journals working to capacity to publish recent findings. However, given the vastness of the continent and the time depth of its past, field research remains relatively scattered. Each new data point therefore adds significantly to the bigger picture. This series (formerly known as the Cambridge Monographs in African Archaeology series) focuses on new contributions to the Holocene archaeology of Africa, particularly primary information on important excavation projects and artefactual assemblage analyses which are beyond the scope of journal publication. In particular, we seek works relevant to the archaeology of food production, metallurgy, complex societies, historical archaeology and material culture studies.

African Archaeology is a continuation of Cambridge Monographs in African Archaeology, conceived by John Alexander and Anthony Hands (founder of BAR), more recently edited by Laurence Smith, Timothy Insoll, Brian Stewart and Stephanie Wynne-Jones. The first title was published in the BAR international series in 1980. Since then, 90 titles have been published in the BAR series and have contributed to the advancement of the subject in the region and around the world.
